A. Respondents' Preferences for Income-Support Policies, including Possible Conservation Conditions for Farmers' Receipt of Aid

Some farmers receive such payments [from the federal government] either to offset or make up for low market prices for their farm products or to pay for damage to their crop from drought or floods. Have you seen, read, or heard about federal government payments to farmers to offset the effects of low market prices or severe weather?

Thinking about federal payments to help farmers stay in business, some people believe that, in exchange for payments, farmers should apply some conservation practices such as protecting waterways, wetlands, and wildlife. Other people prefer that the payments be given without conservation conditions. Do you prefer:

Respondents' Positions on a Proposed Policy to Allocate Relatively More Income-Support Payments to Farmers Willing to Apply Conservation Practices

Some people believe that farmers willing to use university-tested practices to protect water and air from pollution should receive more federal payments than farmers who refuse to do so. Other people believe that allocating the limited money available for helping farmers should be based only on financial need.
Response Choices	% of Respondents per Choice
